Foreman Smith says that Pettus chatted pleasantly and entirely rationally for some minutes, and then, without warning, came up behind him and gave him an awful gash in the throat. Smith selzed the rezor, receiving an ugly wound in his hand, but probably saying his life, by the act. Believing that he had killed Smith, Pattus went from the store. As he left the elevator, however he walked into the arms of Detective Captain Tomlinson and Policeman Hulcher and Talley, who had traced him to the building.

It would be hard to say whether Pettus's condition is due to whiskey or to some drug, or whether his mind has given way In some part as a result of continued drinking. He is said to have thrown a bottle of whiskey out of his window yesterday morning, an unusual act for a drinking man. Two bottles of liquor were found on his person, one being full and the other partially so. The man's condition, however, does not appear to border on delirium tremens, but rather monomania, his bent yesterday being throat-cutting.
